Amador County. Organized in 1854.

Bounded north by El Dorado, east by Alpine, southeast and south by Calaveras, and west by San Joaquin and Sacramento. Area, 700 square miles. Assessed valuation of property for 1874, $2,554,555. County seat, Jackson. Principal towns: Drytown, Fiddletown, Ione, Sutter Creek, and Volcano. The resources are mineral, with capacity for agriculture and grazing to a considerable extent. Fruit, in great variety, is successfully grown, and in the manufacture of wine and brandy Amador promises to take high rank. Its gold mines, particularly in quartz, are among the richest in the world, and their successful prosecution is very encouraging to that interest. The great Mother Lode passes through the county, upon which are some of the richest mines in the State. A bed of coal, or lignite, is found near Ione, which supplies a fair quality of fuel, much used at the mines and mills in the vicinity, and to which a railroad from Stockton is building. Copper and other minerals are found, and successfully mined. The Amador Canal, a grand mining enterprise, was completed in 1874, carrying 5,000 inches of water, giving cheap motive power to machinery and new life to placer mining. The county is long and narrow, extending from the summit to the base of the Sierra Nevada on its western slope. The south branch of the Cosumnes runs along its northern border, and the Mokelumne on its southern. Sutter and Dry creeks, two small streams, are in the lower portion. Lines of stages to Sacramento and Stockton pass through it, connecting with the Central Pacific Railroad at Galt.

Officers: Thomas M. Pawling, County Judge; James B. Stevens, Clerk, Recorder and Auditor; Thomas J. Phelps, District Attorney; Peter Fagan, Sheriff and Tax Collector; John A. Butterfield, Treasurer; John W. Surface, Assessor; William L. McKim, Surveyor; Daniel Myers, Coroner and Public Administrator; Samuel G. Briggs, Superintendent Public Schools.

Anaheim, Los Angeles Co, 26½ miles s e of Los Angeles, 12 miles n of Anaheim Landing, and 22 miles n e of Wilmington. The town is located in the valley of the Santa Ana river, was established in 1857 by an association of Germans, who there undertook the cultivation of the vine on the co-operative principle. A large plat of ground was laid out in fields of twenty acres, and allotted to each shareholder. A canal from the Santa Ana river furnished water for irrigation, and the colony prospered beyond expectation. The town thus established has grown to be a large and important place, sending the products of its vineyards to all parts of the United States, and will, before the end of 1875, be connected by railroad with Los Angeles and the sea. The town of Downey has been laid out, 13 miles north-e, and to this point the Anaheim branch of the Southern Pacific Railroad was completed in October 1874, with the expectation of reaching Anaheim in January following. But the section will never be entirely dependent on railroad transportation, as the sea is near, and at the port, Balsa Chica, a wharf 2,900 feet in length, costing $30,000, is in course of construction by the farmers and business men of the county, which will afford independence and relief to the great and growing business. One newspaper, the Gazette, is published weekly.
