Forest Grove, Washington Co, P O and incorporated town, six miles west of Hillsboro, is on the line of the Oregon Central Railroad, twenty-five miles from Portland. This is in the midst of the region known as the Tualatin Plains, an elevated plateau of the richest soil, and shaded by a fine growth of native trees. From slight elevations an extended and very interesting view is obtained, embracing the broad and fertile valley of the Willamette, while in the distant east rises the grand Cascade Range with the snow-capped peaks of Mounts Hood, St. Helens and Jefferson, distinctly marked against the eastern sky. Here is the seat of the Pacific University and Tualatin Academy, one of the oldest institutions of learning in Oregon, the Academy having received its charter in 1849, the new charter, including both titles, being granted in 1853-4. It is a well endowed and prosperous institution, having a library of 5,000 volumes. Three churches are organized, and a good public school is maintained. The town contains a population of about 800, and is growing. No saloons for selling liquor are allowed.

Gardiner, Douglas Co, P O 80 miles n w of Roseburg, on the north bank of the Umpqua River, eight miles from its mouth; has a population of about 100, and is the principal shipping port on the river. Lumber and leather are manufactured, the latter of excellent quality; and the salmon fisheries also constitute a considerable resource. This is usually regarded as the head of navigation on the Umpqua, as above this the river rushes through a narrow cañon, rendering its ascent difficult; but steamboats sometimes ascend to Scottsburg, 18 miles up the river. The precipitous mountains render land travel difficult, and trade is thus restricted.
