Stockton, Tooele Co, P O, is a mining town of 300 inhabitants, in the district of Rush Valley, 6 miles south of Tooele. The mines were discovered and worked to some extent by the men of the Third California Regiment of Volunteers, in 1863 under command of Gen. P. E. Connor, who, being from Stockton, California, gave that name to the new town. The ores are an argentiferous galena, and the mines are of great value, the principal ones being the Silver King, Muscatine, Hannah, Legal Tender, Leonore, Lincoln and Tucson, and many locations unworked. In the vicinity are the Chicago, Jacobs and Waterman's smelting furnaces, and another building, from which large quantities of bullion, or "rich lead," is taken. A wagon road from Stockton to Dry Cañon, the site of the noted Mono mine, is in course of construction, which will add greatly to the business of the place. The Salt Lake, Sevier Valley and Pioche Railroad is partly graded and is expected to be soon completed, having Stockton on the route. Twenty miles of the Utah Western Railroad is finished from Salt Lake, leaving only about sixteen miles of staging to the metropolis.

Summit County. Organized in 1861.
Bounded north by Morgan and Rich; east by Rich (or Green River) and Wasatch; south by Wasatch; and west by Salt Lake and Davis. Area, 1,250 square miles. Assessed valuation of property for 1870, $325,596. County seat, Coalville. Principal towns: Echo, Hoytsville, Parley Park, Peoa, and Wanship. This is one of the northwestern counties of Utah, and is traversed by the great Pacific Railroad. Its surface is quite mountainous, and is very rugged. The railroad passes through the mountains by the celebrated Echo Cañon, which seems cut for the express purpose of some such great work. In consequence of the destruction of crops for several years past by the locusts or grasshopper
