Private Educational Institutions.

Notwithstanding the largely increased attendance on the public schools, and the disbanding of some of the smaller private schools, the better class of private seminaries, boarding schools and college schools, never were in a more prosperous condition. The interests of private institutions and public schools are not antagonistic. The better the public schools, the larger will be the attendance on the higher grade private schools.

In thoroughness of instruction and excellence of discipline many of the private schools of the city are in no respect inferior to the public schools.

By reference to statistics, it will be seen that about one-fourth of the children in the city who attend any school, go to private schools. This ratio holds good in most American cities.

The whole number of private educational institutions in the city is about sixty, of which twelve are under the control of the Catholic denomination.
