

The Wealth of the West

FUNDAMENTAL RESOURCES

THE wealth of the West is fundamental. It is not dependent upon spasmodic prosperity or superficial industry, but swells steadily from the natural resources of the land. The world needs what the West has to offer for the purpose of food, clothing and shelter—the basic necessities of man.

The West cannot be robbed of its riches, nor can business and economic conditions do more than temporarily retard the natural rewards of its inheritance from its fields and rivers, forests, mines and factories.

This bank has confidence in the future of the West.
